

HAYS WILL DIRECT MAIL THEFT SEARCH

dry bag with which Havranik's head was covered; a third was a photograph of a gunman, taken from the rogues' gallery at Police Headquarters, which the driver somewhat doubtfully identified as one of the three unmasked bandits he saw.

For a time yesterday the hopes of the police and post office inspectors were high that they had found the beginning of a trail left by the men in the green automobile after their car had sped away from the mail truck under the arc light in Leonard street. This was the finding by eight-year-old William Gietter of twenty-five letters wrapped up in a piece of Manila paper and thrown into an ash barrel in front of a vacant lot on Brook avenue, between 145th and 146th streets, The Bronx. The boy, who found them on Tuesday, took them home, but it was not until today that his father, William B. Gietter, of 461 Brook avenue, looked at them and notified the police, who in turn told the postal authorities. Post office inspectors examined them, but found they could not be part of the loot from the Leonard street robbery.

Frank Havranik passed practically the whole day under a fire of questions from the postal detectives at the main post office on Eighth avenue at Thirty-second street. He went home last night but was under orders to return to-day for further questioning. Inspectors Allen and Butler conferred with J. J. McCrum, superintendent of the City Hall station, from which the truck started uptown with its rich load, and secured the names and records of all the postal employees who handled the mail bags in the post office and on the loading platform.

Postal authorities showed great interest yesterday in the story told by Havranik of another automobile. This black machine was ahead of him as, under the compulsion of a revolver and the threats of the three bandits in the green car alongside, he was forced to turn into Leonard street. This car, which with the green pocketed the Ford mail truck, stopped as Havranik pressed the brake of his machine. The driver did not get the number of this machine. The bandits drew a laundry bag over the driver's head and tightened the drawing around his neck. This bag, which is held by the postal authorities, once had sewed on it a cloth strip two inches wide by four inches long containing a name. This was torn off, but a bit with the letter "E" concluding a name was still on the bag.

Havranik, accompanied by two post office inspectors, paid a visit to the bureau of criminal identification at Police Headquarters yesterday morning, where he looked over hundreds of pictures of criminals. On he picked out as possibly a photograph of one of the bandits, but he was not certain of it. This man's location now is being ascertained.

An effort to ascertain whether it was contrary to post office rules to permit more than a million dollars' worth of securities to be transported by a chauffeur, unarmed, alone, through several miles of deserted streets at night failed yesterday. Superintendent McCrum of City Hall station said he did not know whether chauffeurs were supposed to be armed or not; that he had nothing to do with them, as they were under the supervision of E. M. Norris, superintendent of mails here. Sometimes two men went with a truck. The extra man's presence was determined by the amount and value of the mail carried. Mr. Norris was too busy yesterday afternoon to see reporters who tried to ask him about the regulations.

It was learned yesterday that the Chase National Bank, which shipped $462,000 worth of negotiable bonds stolen by the bandits, brought the securities to the post office under the guard of seven armed men.

In the financial district yesterday it was reported that claims against insurance companies promptly filed by banks and brokers came close to $1,000,000.
